

Two shores. One failing door.

On the ninth day of Aras's occupation, Tobious opens a door buried beneath his village and glimpses a wounded version of himself in a city twenty-six hundred years away.

The future offers the strength he was denied: a shield, a legendary blade, and a chance to bring Mariya home. But the gate is built on lives its keepers have chosen not to count. As the Hollow Ones gather in the space between centuries, every rescue shifts danger onto someone unseen.

Mariya is keeping their village alive by other means: grain, water, names, and the stubborn belief that no one should vanish from the record. To save both shores, they must decide what can be kept and what love cannot.
